ASSOCIATIONS

When people live together as couples, whether married or not, their earning and spending behaviour almost always have an effect on each other. Lenders collect information on those financial relationships when consumers make applications for credit. Credit reference agencies hold that information in the form of 'associations' to record financial links between people, so that lenders can consider a full picture of their finances.

However, sometimes people who are no longer (or never have been) linked find themselves connected in this way. Examples might be members of the same family, flatsharers or students sharing a dwelling on a temporary or short-term basis, or couples following a relationship breakdown, such as a divorce.

Disassociations enable you to tell us about your circumstances and ensure that our current records are accurate and up to date.

DECLARATION OF PERSON REQUESTING DISASSOCIATION

I confirm that there are no shared financial arrangements or dependencies between myself and the person detailed in Section B overleaf. We are not part of a single household in which we have shared finances such as income and/or spending.

The person referred to in Section B and myself (please tick relevant boxes):

Do NOT share a bank account, mortgage or any other credit agreements (including any outstanding debts)

Do NOT live together within a household in which we share finances, such that our financial affairs are interdependent

Have SEPARATE and INDEPENDENT incomes

Have NO other shared financial link

I understand that, if I make a false statement and, as a result, I or the other named party on this declaration obtain finance I or they would not have otherwise obtained, I may be guilty of a criminal offence.

I confirm that the above information is correct, and I understand that failure to complete this form, or attempt to misrepresent any information may result in the request for disassociation being refused.

I confirm that TransUnion have the right to verify the details provided against their own records.
